

Natural Gas and Hydrogen

Hydrogen can be used in fuel cells to generate power using a chemical reaction rather than combustion, producing water and heat as by-products.

Although not a source of energy itself, hydrogen can store and deliver usable energy like that produced by natural gas. Once this energy is created it can be used in cars, in houses, for portable power and many many more applications.

Here's how it works:

